China building database for 'psychological warfare': report BEIJING: China is building a vast database of students and teachers across the country to improve its "psychological warfare" capabilities, a media report said on Thursday, ahead of a nationwide campaign of education in the run up to the Communist Party Congress later this month. The "psychological database" will be manned by officials who have received intensive training and will target a wide range of social groups in the official media, a former senior education official said in the report, which was published by the Chinese media outlet China Youth Daily. The database, according to the report, will include detailed information on students, which includes their sports ability, the level of their physical exercise and their contact with "hostile forces" such as Japanese, Korean and US citizens. It will also be used to identify potential "personae non gratae", who will be given punishments and banned from government jobs or school. Last month, the Communist Party announced that teachers who had failed to improve their proficiency in English would not be offered teaching positions after the Party Congress. The campaign for the Party Congress, which will see President Xi Jinping set to stay in office as head of the ruling party for a third term, began on Tuesday with the release of a promotional song that echoed the iron-fisted tactics of former leader Mao Zedong. In another development, Communist Party members have been increasingly targeted in recent years with fierce campaigns to clean up their public reputations by uncovering past crimes or taking bribes. A Chinese government official accused of passing government secrets to the U.S. consulate in Chengdu in 2005 was sentenced to death for "leaking state secrets" on Wednesday.
