I have been writing and sharing all these information since 2009. The cryo-EM of a complex between CD20 and Rituximab is being used to investigate the molecular changes responsible for complement binding. The dynamics of the human immune system is now understood in molecular detail. This is primarily through the advent of direct imaging methods for determining the structures of proteins in their native environment. The CD20 molecule, which is expressed on B-lymphocytes but not T-lymphocytes, is an important target for antibody based cancer therapies. Rituximab is an anti-CD20 antibody used in the treatment of lymphomas, leukemia, and other B-cell malignancies. The structure of the complex between the Rituximab CDR paratope and the CD20 protein has been determined to 11.5 resolution. A highly symmetric structure is consistent with the proposed monovalent binding mechanism of the antibody to CD20. However, the stoichiometry and CDR-mediated interactions that occur in the complex are controversial. The structure also has implications for 3e33713323
