Most people search with a keyboard or mouse. Some types of searches require the use of voice. Google has created an interface for voice commands that work with the Google Home speaker. It also has a website that you can use to easily search the Internet using the voice commands. Think of it as the virtual assistant. You can say something like, "Show me all the movies from 1989," and the Google Assistant will respond. It was a surprising announcement when Google rolled out the service late last year, because we already know it's easy to search with the voice commands on Google. However, with Google's integration of its Assistant with the Google Home speaker, you don't need to be near an Internet-connected computer for searching. Google says you can even use these voice commands from the road. On its website, you can search the Web using your voice. Simply start by saying something like, "Tell me what is happening in the world." From there, the Assistant will respond with up to 12 Google results. If you don't like the response, the Google Home speaker will give you more options. You can even access your Google account to find a more precise answer. In most cases, results you get are the same as what you would get from using the keyboard or mouse. The Assistant tries to understand your request and provide the best results, based on the web page you are on. When Google rolled out its Assistant last year, it made it available on a small number of phones and computers. Now, the company says the Assistant has been rolled out to Google Home, Nest smart home products, Android and iOS. So, if your Android device is connected to Wi-Fi, you can use it with your voice to search the Web. If you ask the assistant what is happening on Google, it will provide up to 25 results for you. You can also use the Assistant on Google Home to ask it a question. One example we received on Tuesday
