Proper design, sharpening and finishing and maintenance will ensure that your knife is long lasting and will last longer than a costly diamond. Whether you are a novice or a seasoned hand, the key to successful results is knowing what the limits are for your particular style of knife. Good tools and sharpening aids can go a long way in making a good knife. You've made the purchase, and you've put hours of work in, and you put your knife in your pocket and go off to the range. Next thing you know, your knife is in a different shape than when you started. Now the question is, has your knife suffered from sharpening in a way that could make it unsafe for you or others? The Problem As much as most of us would like to say, "No one does it as well as I do." Yes, if there was a relevant trophy or badge for the Sharpest Sharper in the World, you would have it. But, because you're human and prone to some sort of inconsistency, you can't win every time. There are tools and methods out there that are acceptable to use in terms of reducing the amount of use of the good steel and not spoiling it, but the over use of abrasives, sharpening media and hand sharpening tips are dangerous. Most sharpeners over use the stone because they don't know any better and for the most part they don't even know the tools and methods that can be d0c515b9f4
